Patricia M. Battin, retired president of the Commission on Preservation and Access, was one of eight individuals who received the 1999 National Humanities Medal. The medalists are “distinguished individuals who have set the highest standards for American cultural achievement,” said William R. Ferris, chair of the National Endowment for the Humanities, which sponsors the award. Battin was recognized for organizing and leading a national campaign to save millions of disintegrating books published between 1850 and 1950. And she galvanized congressional support for a national program to microfilm these brittle books, thereby preserving their content as a significant part of the record of American civilization. She was also instrumental in the formation of a European Commission on Preservation and Access, which addresses the problems of decaying books in European libraries. As co-editor of a 1998 book about the impact of information technology on education (The Mirage of Continuity: Reconfiguring Academic Information Resources for the 21st Century), she argues that customized teaching and learning via the computer represent a new learning paradigm that will change the nature of universities in the digital age.
