effective during its first few months and served as an excellent source of example searches and teaching tips.

Future developments are already affecting current practice. As patrons begin to access the system at remote sites, without the ready aid of any library staff or even a copy of LCSH, minimal training becomes even more important. For example, while using keyword searching to bypass LCSH is sometimes successful, it also leads people to erroneous conclusions that a little information could correct. Others assume that the system is a complete listing of all holdings, despite the introductory screen. While BI is not going to solve all of these ills, for the first time the library is physically moving away from its staff into dorms, private homes, and the more than thirty microcomputer sites all over campus. Paperchase's UM-Medline is already providing online access to Index Medicus using the same readily available software so that some patrons use a single workstation to search for both books and articles on medical topics. Discussions are underway about mounting the Wilson tapes onto the same system. This requires strong outreach and support efforts from libraries to continue providing service where patrons need it. Relying on access to students via the usual faculty conduits may not meet this new need. As well attended, walk-in training sessions demonstrated, patrons will choose to learn when given a convenient, relevant opportunity. Another challenge of this new BI effort is to use the hook of teaching online catalog mechanics to delve into critical thinking and problem solving, where possible. Patrons will then learn to question less than optimal results of their searches, no matter where those searches take place. The challenge is exciting and will only continue to grow.
