Minnesota update

A federal appeals court rejected a female faculty member's claim that she was denied tenure at the University of Minnesota Libraries because of sex discrimination. In its unanimous ruling, filed on July 8, the three-judge panel of the Eighth U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals found "that the University administration's conclusion that (the plaintiff's) publications did not constitute 'distinction in research and writing' was a reasonable position under the circumstances, and justified no inference of sexual discrimination." The court further noted: "There was no issue of credibility in this heavily-documented record, nor was there any indication of a sexually hostile environment."

Linda DeBeau-Melting won the first round in the case when district court special master Viola Kanatz ruled that the University should grant her tenure. Kanatz's decision was overturned by magistrate Patrick McNulty. The appellate court agreed with McNulty that "the critical findings of the master were clearly erroneous."

DeBeau-Melting was hired as a tenure-track instructor in 1974 and was denied tenure in 1979 and 1980. In 1981 and 1982 she filed sex discrimination claims under the Rajender consent decree, which provides a legal process for University of Minnesota women faculty to file sex discrimination complaints. The decree was adopted as part of the settlement in a 1973 class action suit by Shyamala Rajender, who argued that she had been denied tenure in the Chemistry Department because of her sex.

Reorganized to reflect research trends
The material in RCD is arranged in 17 subject sections. In this edition several sections have been reorganized and tailed coverage of research trends. For example, the mathematics section is now more accurately entitled "Computers and Mathematics." Also the 17 sections have been combined into four groups of related fields. Life Sciences, Physical Sciences and Engineering, Private and Public Policy and Affairs, and Social and Cultural Studies.

Comprehensive indexing
Also new to the 10th edition is a more detailed and comprehensive index which lists workshops, seminars, conferences, projects, programs, affiliated centers, associations, consortia, and other related activities and organizations mentioned within the text of an entry. An additional convenience for the user is the inclusion of the see also listings for entries found in Government Research Directory.

Entries detail the subject covered, method of funding, size and location of the project, extent of the library, annual budget, publications, director's name, name of parent institution, address, phone number, librarian's name, size of staff, special facilities, and more.
