HORIZONS OF CRITICISM

An Assessment of Religious-Literary Options
Vernon Ruland

This brilliant work systematically evaluates the important critical works on religion and literature with a view to their contribution toward defining these studies as parts of an interdisciplinary field. The approach is to classify contemporary writing in both these areas according to their perception of a total religious-literary experience.

By using a typology of four concentric areas, Vernon Ruland is able to offer a comprehensive religious-literary definition of his own. This theory has two uses. First, it offers a means for the reshaping of one's personal intellectual categories so as better to encompass human realities, and, second, it discovers an underlying unity in the separate quests of today's theologians, philosophers, and literary critics.

The work is also a handbook for the study of literature and religion. By serving as a guide to its essential literature, joining issues and relating themes, it suggests the contents of an educational program and sets the directions for further study.

"...may well turn out to be the basic handbook of religious-literary studies for years to come." Christianity and Literature

"...should be invaluable to graduate students in literature and theology, or, most of all, the interdisciplinary field that relates the two." Choice, September 1976

"...meets a long-standing need for a convenient handbook capable of introducing the advanced student in both areas to the interdisciplinary sphere of religious-literary studies." Christian Scholar's Review
