Library staff discovered they were in the middle of the place everyone wanted to be but couldn’t—the Olympic Village.

Changing Olympic perspectives

To say working in the Olympic Village was inconvenient would be an understatement. Staff frustration before the Olympic secure period was high. Dire predictions were being made about traffic congestion, and procedural changes and new restrictions were publicized almost daily. As the athletes began arriving and the campus was transformed into the Olympic Village, the festive atmosphere helped to lift spirits. Library staff discovered they were in the middle of the place everyone wanted to be but couldn’t—the Olympic Village.

Library staff had virtually unlimited access to the Olympic Village, which included the opportunity to participate in activities for the athletes. Free concerts and performances were ongoing in the center of campus, and the cafe offered free coffee and beverages for everyone in the Village, not just the athletes. The Village hosted the international premiere of the action film Eraser, and stars Arnold Schwarzenegger and Vanessa Williams made guest appearances. President Clinton made a speech in the Village. Many staff used their breaks and lunch times to take photographs, mingle with the athletes, and participate in pin trading. Staff met and talked with people from all over the world, and found that the Olympic spirit was infectious.

At the end of the Games, some library staff temporarily experienced a letdown, since many years of planning and effort had been devoted to several quick weeks of athletic competition. Looking back, it seems that the Games opened and closed simultaneously. Being in the middle of the Olympic Village was a wonderful and once-in-a-lifetime experience. The athletes and their competitions, the international visitors, and the star-filled ceremonies contributed to a unique ambiance. People with different languages, social customs, and political perspectives competed and shared as members of a global village. The Georgia Tech Library and Information Center staff were proud participants in this village’s activities and events.

Note